Contrast with endofar. Adjective: Exophoric Pronunciation: EX-o-for-uh Also known as: Exophoric Link Etymology: From Greek, beyond and carry exophoric pronouns, says Rom Harre, are the ones that are disambiguated for reference, only if the hearth is fully aware of the context of use, for example, the presence of an exophore link so from context, it is more common in speech and dialogue than in narrative prose. This man there says that must be assisted in the carriages, and raised over the ditches, and have the best place everywhere... Then they talk about it in their heads; What do they call it? A member of the audience says, Intelligence. That's it, darling. What did that have to do with women's rights or the rights of blacks? If my cup won't hold but a pint, and your holds a quart, wouldn't you like to let me have my little half-measure full? (Truth Sojourner, Am I Not a Woman? 1851) An excerpt below, taken from a conversation between two people discussing real estate listings, contains a number of examples of exophoric references, all highlighted in italics: Speaker: I'm hungry. Oh, look at that. Six bedrooms. Jesus. It's pretty cheap for six bedrooms, isn't it seventy thousand. Is that who you were talking about? Speaker B: I don't know. Personal pronouns are me, we and you each exophor, because they refer to the persons involved in the conversation. The pro pro proun I have in my address the Speaker, we are as a speaker and the person addressed, and you are the recipient. A pronoun that is also exophorically, because this pronoun refers to a certain description in the written text that the two speakers read together. (Charles F. Mayer, Representing English Linguistics. Cambridge University Press, 2010) In the discourse as a whole, third-person pronouns can be either endophores, referring to the nouns in the text... or exophor, referring to someone or something manifested to the participants from the situation or from their mutual knowledge (Here he is, for example, on seeing someone who and the sender and the recipient expect)... In the songs, 'you' ... is multi-exophore, as it can refer to many people in an actual and fictional situation. Take, for example: Well in my heart you are my dear, at my gate welcome in, at my gate I will meet you dear, if your love I could only win. This is the call of one lover to another... The recipient of the song appears to be eavesdropping on half of the dialogue. I'm a singer, and you're her lover. In addition, and more often than not, especially away from a live performance, the receiver projects himself into the persona of the recipient and hears the song as if it were her own words to her own lover. In addition, the listener can project himself into the persona of the singer's lover and hear the singer, appeal to her . (Guy Cook, Discourse Advertising.
